The Mansion House Lounges, which once formed part of the Wernher family home, is now the setting for gatherings of friends and families enjoying Luton Hoo's seasonal Afternoon Tea.

Julius Wernher originally resided opposite The Ritz in London in 1903 and admired its interior so much he replicated its style throughout Luton Hoo, hence the similarities between Palm Court and the Pillared Hall.

The Italianate Drawing Room, which leads out to the Formal Gardens, was the original grand Ballroom where many large family celebrations were held (the wooden floor is 'sprung' for dancing).

It is easy to imagine the very grand occasions that would have taken place in the days of the Wernher family. Many of which would have included their close friends, Queen Elizabeth II and the Duke of Edinburgh.

In later years, before the Mansion House and estate was revived into a luxurious five star hotel, it was the location for many films. You may recognise the Drawing Room as the location of the second wedding in 'Four Weddings and a Funeral'.

Should you wish to learn more about Luton Hoo, a specially commissioned history book is available for purchase from reception.
